It's worth it, because you'll get a free boost of some pre-selected ideologies based on your in-game appearance and gender (but that, too, will be determined by the popularity of your character). Once they're in, the player is free to choose any of the short answers. Unlike in a presidential election, however, there are no places where you can vote more than once. Instead, the game will simply ask again for which answer you'd like to support, and you'll have to pick the one that appears strongest on the majority of your answers. The first time I played, I went for the last question, "Should it be illegal for men to refuse sex to women who don't want to have sex with them?" I figured that the default answer would probably be something like "no," since that would mean less hassle. But what came up next was a bit of a surprise: "No, and don't try to change my mind." It was "no" that the majority of the crowd supported. That seems fitting, because it means that the game's creator, Benjamin Flores Jr., ended up going against his own beliefs. But he explained in an interview with GameSpot that despite his personal views, he feels like banning prostitution is a bad idea. "There's this natural fallacy in that if everyone says something is wrong, then it must be wrong," he said. "I believe that prostitution itself is fundamentally dehumanizing and exploitative, but the social stigma around it is enough to keep it going
